ABSTRACT

This article describes the concept of religious worldview, its study in psychology, the main elements of the religious worldview and ideas about its emergence. In this regard, the scientific study of religious aspects is in the focus of modern scholars, constantly evolving in the life of society, as well as in the individual life of man, revealing new forms and manifestations. The essence of the structure of the concept of religious worldview is reflected in the subjective assimilation of religious ideas, values, norms, and is expressed in the subjective assessment of what the individual and at the same time religion gives a person what he chooses for himself. The whole phenomenon of the seeker seems expedient. By its very nature, this system is the result of man's assimilation of an objective being through religious views. One of the basic concepts in the psychological study of religion is the religious worldview, which, as a form of spiritual assimilation of being, is seen as the basic foundation of human consciousness, absorbed into it at the level of life, self-awareness and thinking.
