ABSTRACT

If we look at the lexical richness of any language, we can see in the lexicon that makes it up words that have been borrowed from other languages that are far and close to the people belonging to that language, and that is what these words have learned. A certain percentage of the urban language. In general, the assimilation of a particular language into the lexicon of another language is more likely to be the result of the dependence of a particular state on a country under the pressure of that powerful state and its subordination to it as a colony. It would be ridiculous.
