ABSTRACT

The second wave of American women's liberation was often unaware of the paths in its theories, and its political practice failed to adequately address the common concerns of women of color and ethnicity in the United States and overseas. It was also unconcerned with how it looked to many in the younger generation as a harsh and disciplined women's emancipation. It repeated counter-talks as a consequence of such susceptible sides, which ultimately undermined its authority. The new thesis of the third wave, on the other hand, embraced a more diverse and polyvocal women's emancipation that charmed many who felt confined or restricted inside the previous wave. This fresh discussion, based on differentiation, dissected and decentred the following wave's ideas, providing improved methods for understanding and restricting.
